7. Mr. Helms then discussed Vietnam briefly, utilizing the attached paper. He also discussed in general terms, "The Will to Persist" study furnishing the general conclusions. Mr. Andrews inquired the Director's view on progress of the war. The Director pointed out there had been no major Communist operations during the monsoon season and that certainly the military picture was better. He stated, however, that the military victory will not solve the problems and there must be continuing efforts on the civic side. In response to a question as to how to stop the supplies to the south, the Director stated the three steps necessary would be (1) blockading Haiphong, (2) interdicting the two main rail lines in China, and (3) stepping up the bombing campaign of the military and industrial complex. The Director stated that this increases the risks that China might enter the war and that our estimate on this is that if the North Vietnamese government went into a total collapse, the ChiComs might enter the war.

8. The Director then discussed the situation in Communist China generally following the attached briefing. In response to a question, he discussed our knowledge of Mao's health, pointing out that we had good reports on this situation and that obviously he did not take his famous swim.
